Depending on the state of the user input, there can be different views. Right now, I am creating all the views from scratch, creating them and calling setVisible on them. This isn't very efficient, and I am concerned about the possibility of erasing the state of the program as the user switches between views. Is there any way I can just restore the state of my program and have it be the same as if they just ran the program for the first time? Edit: Also, how can I store the views (the content of each view)? A: I don't have a solution to your question, but there is a good chance that you are violating the single responsibility principle. Your screen should not have anything to do with your data. Your data should not depend on your screen. You can have a view that acts differently depending on the state of your data, but the views shouldn't need to know anything about the data, they should just look at it.
